ABSTRACT

The purpose of the present study is to estimate the growth and survival percentages of L. vannamei from the culture ponds of Vadacheepurupalli with the application of probiotic (PRO-2) along with 1, 3  $\beta$ -Glucan. This study was conducted over a period of 120 days for each crop during the year 2019. The study was conducted in two different crops i.e. summer crop and winter crop. The standard water quality parameters were maintained throughout the study period. Experiments were conducted in three different ponds. One is treated as control pond and other two ponds (Pond-A and Pond B) as experimental ponds. It is evident from the present study findings that, the overall highest growth and survival of the shrimps were recorded in the experimental ponds (treated with probiotics) than control one during culture period from the selected station. Based on the results obtained in this study the probiotics have beneficial effects on the growth and survival by enhancing gut activities and other metabolic processes. During summer crop in the control pond the survival rate of shrimp was 80%. The highest survival was recorded in Pond-A (91%), and lowest survival was reported in Pond-B (89%). During winter crop in the control pond the survival rate of shrimp was 79%. The highest survival rate was recorded in Pond-B (88%), and lowest survival rate was recorded from Pond-A (85%).

Abstract

Original Research Article

The paper enumerates 60 medicinal plant species belonging to 49 genera and 35 families used for 43 ethnomedicinal purposes by the Nukha Dora primitive tribe of Dumbriguda Mandalam Alluri Sitaramaraju district, Andhra Pradesh. Many elderly persons of the village are also aware about the importance and use of such herbal medicines. A review of the available scientific literature suggests that many of the medicinal plants used by the tribals can be validated scientifically in their traditional uses based on reported pharmacological activities present in those plants.
